

HEADERSTART A Full-Width Title Spanning Both Columns

This abstract runs the full width of the text block, well across the central gutter, so it cannot belong to either column and must be peeled off above the two-column body before the columns are read. HEADEREND closes the header band.

LEFTSTART the entire left column of the body is read top to bottom before the right column, after the full-width header above it. each line is ordinary body prose that fills its narrow measure so the column is clearly distinct from the header that spans the whole page. we add several lines so the body columns are tall and unmistakably real columns. LEFTEND closes the left column.

RIGHTSTART the right column follows only after the whole left column, and only after the full-width header has been emitted first of all. it likewise wraps as body prose filling its measure, line after line, so the two columns are similar in height and the gutter between them stays clear. RIGHTEND closes the right.
