

LEFTSTART the entire left column is read top to bottom before the right; each line is ordinary justified body prose that reaches the column edge so a naive width guess would overshoot the narrow central gutter and merge the columns. we add many lines so the columns are tall enough to be real columns and not a short caption that should stay on one line. LEFTEND closes the left.

RIGHTSTART the right column must follow only after the whole left column, the reading-order property under test here. it likewise wraps as justified prose filling its measure to the right margin, line after line, so that the two columns are comparable in height and the gutter between them stays clear except for the page number. RIGHTEND closes the right column of the page.